ARCHITECTURAL SIGNIFICANCE (describe important architectural features and evaluate in terms of other buildings within community)

This 1 1/2 story gable end house has some interesting features from Greek Revival and Italianate styles. The gables do not return, but have mitered ends, and the cornice is very broad, being made of lapped boards on both gable end and sides. Transitional to the Italianate, full length windows capped by shallow pediments appear on the first floor, while paired colonnettes support the full width porch.

HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE (explain the role owners played in local or state history and how the building relates to the development of the community)

The Nichols, members of a very early Reading family, were probably farmers. A glance at the Reading Map of 1875 shows the northern part of town with 9 separate Nichols houses. This house was built near an ancestral homestead.

Criteria for Evaluation

The John B. Nichols House is significant chiefly as an interesting example of a building that reflects the transition between the Greek Revival and Italianate style in residential architecture. It retains integrity of location, design, setting, material and workmanship and meets Criterion C of the National Register.
